

Desert Dialogue

From the President

This holiday season will be a good one for me and Southwest Airmotive Corporation. As we complete our fifth full year of business here in the high desert and close this chapter, I find myself satisfied but not complacent with the fact that 2009 was a solid year for the company. We processed a good amount of work and will end the year as strong as any company with which I've ever associated. Having just celebrated a great Thanksgiving Day and looking forward to the festivities at the end of the year, I openly acknowledge and extend my heartfelt thanks to the employees, our loyal customers and our committed vendors. Each group has played an important role in the success of the organization this year.

We've made some key internal changes that have enabled us to increase our corporate visibility while at the same time enabling us to better monitor our financial position and manage our production process. All put together, I anticipate a busier shop in 2010, which confirms my decision to re-position the company to the Eloy Municipal Airport, midway between Phoenix and Tucson, and home to the busiest skydive operation in the world, SkyDive Arizona.

We continue to deliver quality product to our customers and they continue to reward us with their loyalty. We are most grateful for that vote of confidence. With increased visibility and through word of mouth from our loyal customers, new clients are giving us the opportunity to maintain their engines.

As a small company, we rely on the support and cooperation of our vendors. We have, are and will continue to fulfill our financial commitments to our vendors, and they continue to reward us with excellent service and the support we need to deliver quality product, on time and at a fair and reasonable price.

It has been quite a year for us at Southwest Airmotive Corporation. We thank our employees, our clients and our vendors, and we look forward to serving you and working together with you in 2010.
